Concept note

Image of the region in Eurasian Studies

The revived interest in 'the region' as a category of research indicates the growing importance of not only spatial characteristics but also human settings that qualify this spatial characteristic. This comes into play not just in the geographical determination of 'regions' but also in its designation as a separate entity. It finds its most interesting manifestation in changed designations, emanating from a selective use of geographical knowledge, that follow political transformations. What is interesting is that while there is obviously a geography of space, distance, time, terrain and weather, there is also a geography of imagination. As one of the most imagined spaces on the global map Eurasia has been variously perceived and constructed in different epochs. An examination of these is interesting in terms of understanding how definitions of the region are evolving and its reflections in studies of the region. The focus of the present seminar is on the ways in which Eurasian studies have evolved in various Asian centres of research.

While there is interest in Eurasia as a geopolitical entity, the features of Eurasia's cultural environment are not lost sight of. Parallel discourses about cultural interconnections and tangled histories in an Asiatic space have surfaced. In the entire gamut of post-Soviet studies about 'regionology', the emphasis is not merely on binary relationships and divergent patterns and challenges encountered by the post-Soviet states of Eurasia but also about diverse community patterns, institutional arrangements that have played a prominent role in imparting dynamism to the region. The discussion has also shifted to a mosaic of trans-national phenomena in the entire Eurasian neighbourhood. A multitude of images about a Eurasian ecumene has produced a great deal of interest in comparable situations in regions such as South Asia.

The idea that gained ground within the format of regionology is how regions reinvented themselves through an envisioning of spatial entities like Slavic Eurasia, Central Eurasia, Central Asia or Inner Asia. Today, each of these spatial connotations are critical components of debates that have emerged within the realm of history, historiography, historical geography, international relations, social anthropology etc. In the regional discourse, the emphasis is on future possibilities rather than missed opportunities. Krais and okrugs show more involvement and there is a tendency for new regional partnerships.

The present seminar will try to deal with some of these variables, taking into consideration the multiple settings of Eurasia—the Slavic, the Mongol, the Turkic, the Chinese, the nomadic, the sedentary and also the cosmopolitan.

The Fourth East Asian Regional Conference on Eurasian Studies is being organized by Maulana Abul Kalam Azad Institute of Asian Studies, Kolkata which is an autonomous institute under the Ministry of Culture, Government of India.
